All meaningful and lasting change starts with a mirror. When you engage with this reflection remember that it's up to you to create the optimal conditions for learning; put people first and everything else second. Now that you understand the concept of the rich classroom climate mindset and have strategies to ensure your classroom fulfills its promise, it's time to self-assess and reflect on what comes next. Use the following questions to accomplish this.

1. When you look objectively at your classroom, do you see evidence that its climate fosters greatness? If not, reread these strategies to find the tool you need to move forward.
2. What strategy from part four will have the most impact on your classroom climate? When you put it into practice, how will you determine its effects?
3. What is the impact of your classroom's existing rules on its climate? What changes should you make that will help improve it?
4. What new activities can you implement that will help students believe in their ability to succeed in your class?
5. When your students struggle or show signs that they aren't buying into your climate-setting practices, how will you connect with them and raise them up?
