

How I Would Like to Celebrate

Name: _____ Date: _____

Everyone has their own way of celebrating successes, and how we celebrate connects to who we are as people. Take a moment and consider how you might like to celebrate when the time comes. Check off any ideas that appeal to you.

- Spoken words of acknowledgment (for example, specific description of what I did well or related to specific goals)
- Written acknowledgment (for example, a small note, a text, an email, or a letter)
- Tracking of targets (for example, checklists of things I am working on that I can use to monitor growth)
- Goal-setting sheets that include strengths, successes, and prior knowledge and skills
- Celebrations with family through notes, emails, phone calls, letters, or videos from me or my teacher
- Peer celebrations with classmates and friends
- Mentor celebration shared via email or phone call
- Selection and display of samples of growth with specific goal labels
- Established signals of celebration (for example, high five, cheer, thumbs up)
- Quiet conversations and conferences
- Celebration wall (a place to acknowledge successes)
- Goal jars to enter record of goal success—reflect and celebrate once a month
- Celebration page in data notebooks in which you list successes
- Strength-based role supports offered to peers (“Ask me for help with . . .”)
- Class rewards (for example, dance-off or visiting time)
- Journaling celebrations (a chance to personally reflect on what is going well)
- A letter or card to myself
