

Leaving Good Blog Comments

The best blogs are truly interactive, with users listening and responding to one another. They are interesting digital conversations! Highly accomplished commenters are constantly thinking while interacting with others who are leaving comments. They come to the conversation with an open mind, willing to reconsider their own positions—and willing to challenge the positions of others. The following tips will help you craft great blog comments.

Gather Your Thoughts

To be an active blog commenter, start by carefully reading the original post. Then, take the following steps while working your way through the comments left by others.

Tasks	Your Response
Gather facts. Jot down things that are interesting and new to you. Facts often become the source for fascinating questions or new strands of conversation.
Make connections. Relate and compare things you are hearing to things you already know from your personal life or your studies.
Ask questions. What confuses you about the comments that have already been made? What don't you understand? Remember that there will a/ways be questions in an active thinker's mind.
Give opinions. Make judgments about what you are viewing and hearing. Do you agree? Do you disagree? Like? Dislike? Do you support or oppose anything that you have heard or seen? Why?

Source: Tasks adapted from Santa, C. M., Havens, L. T., & Valdes, B. J. (2004). Project CRISS: Creating independence through student-owned strategies (3rd ed.). Dubuque, IA: Kendall/Hunt.

Craft Your Comment

Good blog comments require the same skills as any piece of writing—careful proofreading, solid elaboration, and accurate punctuation. Use the following steps to craft a good blog comment.

Task	Your Response
Include an opening quote. While commenting, try to respond directly to other readers. Begin by quoting some part of the comment that you are responding to. That will help other readers know what has caught your attention. Example: Jack K. posed a wonderful question: “Do adults hate more than children do?”
Elaborate—even if you don’t agree. Next, explain your own thinking in a few short sentences. Elaboration is important when you are trying to make a point. When responding to another reader, don’t be afraid to disagree with something he or she has said. Challenging another reader will help him or her reconsider his or her own thinking—and will force you to explain yours! Just be sure to disagree agreeably; impolite people are rarely influential. Example: Chyna argued that adults are more likely to hate than children. I agree with her mostly because adults have had more experiences with people than children have. When you haven’t had many experiences, you are less likely to jump to conclusions about others—and often, hate starts when we jump to conclusions about people that we disagree with.
Answer questions. Point out places where you are confused. Raise perspectives that haven’t been considered. Make comparisons to topics that you’ve already studied. Share what surprises you—either about the topic or the thoughts of your peers. Example: I think that we all hate the same but the hate starts with parents, teachers, and others in authority. It’s really hard not to adapt to what everyone else is thinking or doing. Hate is a strong feeling toward a certain person because he or she is different—and we all know people who are different.

Task	Your Response
Finish with a question. Digital conversations are like any good conversation—they depend on interesting questions and new strands of thought to keep them alive. That means the best blog comments end with a question designed to keep people talking. Your question should be open ended, which means participants shouldn't be able to respond with a yes or no answer. It should also be related to the body of your comment. Finally, it should be interesting enough to make others want to respond! Example: That idea poses another question for me: Do you think that people who hate are afraid of difference or are they really just afraid of change? Isn't it more comfortable to stay the way we are than to try to become something new?
Prepare to be challenged. If another reader challenges your thinking in a blog conversation, don't be offended. Listen to your peers, consider their positions, and decide whether or not you agree with them. You might discover that they've got good ideas you hadn't thought about. Either way, respond—let your challengers know how their ideas have influenced you.
General Reminders
Don't ever use your real name or the name of your school when commenting! Remaining anonymous is the safest way to add comments to blogs. Don't respond to anyone who says something inappropriate to you in a blog comment. Find your teacher if this happens! Be sure to proofread your posts carefully. Tons of errors will make people think that you don't know what you are talking about.	